Aramaeans themselves claimed not only rights to the land of Syria, but also. In wireless networks, a network is structured in such a way that a plurality of network devices operate and share the wireless channel. Examples of such a network structure include a wireless local area network (WLAN) and an extended service set (ESS) in which a plurality of BSs (base stations) share a wireless channel in a mobile communication system. There are several methods of detecting unknown network devices in such wireless networks. In one method, the number of wireless stations is continuously monitored to determine whether the number of stations is beyond a predetermined range. In another method, an unresponsive apparatus is automatically removed from the network after a predetermined time elapses. In yet another method, an unresponsive apparatus is excluded from the network after a predetermined time elapses. In another method, by collating identification data such as a MAC (media access control) address of each apparatus that operates on the network, a network device is detected that does not operate or does not operate within a predetermined time. In yet another method, the number of network apparatuses that operate on the network is continuously monitored. When a predetermined number of apparatuses stop operating, an unresponsive apparatus is excluded from the network. In each of the above methods, network apparatuses that are excluded from the network are still allowed to continue operation. In a network structure in which a plurality of base stations share a wireless channel in a mobile communication system, it is difficult to completely exclude the base stations that do not operate. In particular, in a mobile communication system in which the operation of the base stations is controlled by
