Is The Miso Grilled Garlic Shrimp Wrapped in Liver Needing A Makeover? Woo, me gusta. This might be the most meaty appetizer I've seen in a while. Where it comes from: A small Chicago restaurant called The Miso House. (See above.) How it compares to its inspiration: It's a self-described "gentlemeaty" (they like that one, too) version of char siu bao. The marinade is beef broth, brown sugar, sherry vinegar and miso, which is tasty (think salmon roe and soy sauce). Get it: There's a soft-shell crab version that may be as good, but it's $10 a pop. $15.95 The crust: No word if Chef Ho's technique is a matter of altering the temp of the slow cooker vs. battering a wrapper, but, in any case, it's sturdy. It has a sweet crust and mildly sweet lobster flavor -- not too strong. What's surprising is that the shredded shrimp makes a strong impression here: the resemblance to liver is so great, my husband and I both thought, "Huh?" It's like eating a moist, salty liver wienie and getting eight pieces of juicy shrimp. The filling: Cut into the crust, you'll find plenty of shrimp and delicious little pieces of lobster meat. The meat isn't too dry, and there's a superfaint flavor of garlicky ketchup. This is serious shrimp. If the filling had more lobster meat, it would be a toss-up whether it would be any better than the crab. (Yeah, this might be weird, but if you compare the crab and the shrimp, you'll agree that when it comes to the lobster meat in the filling, the shrimp wins.) The lobster: Shrimp are better than lobster. Garlic shrimp is better than shrimp and garlic. This is a strange appetizer for a restaurant specializing in Asian food, but what's done is done. If you like garlic, you'll like this. Wrap up: Is it worth stopping in for a bite? Heck, yeah. In addition to the filling, the crust is sturdy
